The Bush administration's "war on terrorism" is inundated with contradictions and double standards. This is overwhelmingly obvious in the cases involving Luis Posada Carriles, "the most notorious terrorist of Latin America", and five Cubans imprisoned by the US government for trying to stop terrorism by the likes of Posada.

Why then is a notorious terrorist being protected from justice, while five heroes whose convictions were rightfully overturned remain imprisoned?

This forum will examine the background of these cases and explore the answer to that important question. In addition to video presentation, there will be a legal analysis from Jose Pertierra and Leonard Weinglas, attorneys who are working on the respective cases.
